Art without Audiences

"Simple Hearts: An Address regarding the Consequences of Supply-Side Aesthetics" by Dave Hickey, in Art Issues (Summer 1998), 8721 Santa Monica Blvd., Ste. 6, Los Angeles, Calif. 90069.

The art world has grown to massive proportions in recent decades, thanks to the largesse of the federal government, major universities, and public and private foundations. But something vital is missing: an actively engaged public, contends Hickey, a columnist for Art Issues and a professor of art at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. The museums and other institutions exhibiting contemporary art have become indifferent to what their audience thinks. Since the works of art “are presumed to be valuable by governmental fiat, by executive decision,” he says, the public’s opinion of them has been rendered superfluous.

This is a profoundly mistaken approach, Hickey argues. It is the beholders, not the artist, who give value and meaning to works of art, who see that the works are remembered, because they want them to be remembered. By disenfranchising the beholders, the National Endowment for the Arts, the universities, and the rest of today’s artistic “support systems” have isolated artists from the broader culture. As a result, Hickey asserts, the practice of art is dying. “Art stops mattering to the individual citizens of the republic and begins to fade from public consciousness, where it must live. And it is fading today, as a consequence of... an obsession with origins, intentions, and production—an obsession with the people who make the work, their personal egos and identities, and at the expense of those citizens who might invest it with value.”

The art world, Hickey maintains, was led astray in 1972, when President Richard M. Nixon took what had been the modest National Endowment for the Arts created four years earlier and initiated its “substantial, ongoing expansion,” transforming public art institutions into “the arbiters and primary providers of contemporary visual culture to the nation.” Simultaneously, the government phased out tax credits for donations of art to public institutions, making it less attractive for patrons to buy works of art.

“By expanding government largesse to artists and art institutions while reducing governmental incentives for commerce in art,” Hickey writes, “Nixon effectively shifted the focus of art discourse from its consequences to its causes—creating a situation in which art was much more likely to be made and much less likely to be sold.” By funding museums and other institutions, Nixon “made possible government-regulated venues in which this art (which wasn’t going to be bought) could be exhibited.” Before long, this “publicly funded art world began to conceive itself in opposition to the world in which secular commerce in art took place.” Contemporary artists became increasingly isolated and irrelevant.

But the situation is changing, he believes. “The government is tiring of funding art about which no one cares.”

In the meantime, Hickey has a suggestion for the artists, critics, and educators who are supposed to be above commerce: “If we are really as selfless and public-spirited and committed to art as we say we are, let’s just give it away, as a public service.”

OTHER NATIONS

Poland’s Shocking Success

In 1992, after two years of “shock therapy,” Poland was reeling. Real wages had declined 20 percent, gross domestic product had fallen 35 percent, exports to the imploded Soviet Union had dropped 90 percent, and unemployment had climbed to 12 percent. When ex-Communists emerged victorious in the 1993 general election, the message seemed clear: the radical plan to shift rapidly from a command economy to a
In the North Korean Gulag

In the North Korean communist regime’s “far-reaching system of terror, degradation, and slave labor,” an estimated 200,000 people are now being held in more than 10 different prison camps for such “crimes” as reading a foreign newspaper or complaining about the food situation, report the editors of Journal of Democracy (July 1998). Sun Ok Lee, who served a five-year prison term and later defected to South Korea, tells of her experience in the “North Korean gulag”:

On 26 October 1986, I was arrested on the false charge of “government property embezzlement,” and was subjected to all kinds of severe tortures and cruel treatment during the period of preliminary investigation for 14 months. I was so badly beaten, kicked, and suffocated that I could hardly walk from the cell to the interrogation office. They had to drag me all the way. My lip was torn half way to my ear. They frequently poured cold water on my body and left me outside in freezing winter nights for one hour each time. They called this “fish freezing.” Once I was left on the floor unconscious for many hours and woke up to find worms in my wounds. . . .

My days in North Korea’s Kaechon Prison began in November 1987, 14 months after my arrest. . . . Eighty percent of the prisoners were ordinary housewives who had committed a minor offense, such as attempting to buy a blanket in the market for her daughter’s wedding. . . . A 52-year-old housewife failed to detect a small needle in a huge pile of used cotton for army winter uniforms. She was sent to the punishment cell, a small space with a ceiling so low that the prisoner cannot stand. The walls have sharp spikes so that the prisoner cannot lean against them and a toilet hole at the bottom so that the prisoner cannot sit. A prisoner must stay there for a week. When she was released after a week, she could not walk and had to crawl on her hands and knees. However, she tried to work hard to accomplish her work quota and get a full ration. The guards kicked her many times when she could not move fast. One day she died on a cold floor. The senior guard in charge complained: “Are we going to waste another straw mat to get rid of this corpse?” Thus a dear housewife perished without the knowledge of her family. This was only the beginning, and I was to see many similar incidents in the years to come.
Asia’s Other Giant

Foreign investors rushing to take advantage of economic opportunity in China in recent years have barely paused to notice Asia’s other population giant, India. That neglect is not likely to last, contend Manor, a Professorial Fellow at the Institute of Development Studies, University of Sussex, Brighton, and Segal, director of studies at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, London.

With a population (900 million) three-fourths the size of China’s, India has an economy that is still only a little more than half as large: $225 billion in gross domestic product in 1993, compared with China’s $425 billion. In 1996, India received slightly more than $2 billion in foreign direct investment—while China raked in $38 billion. Eighty-five percent of the money poured into China from abroad comes from ethnic Chinese, and India has no equivalent diaspora.

However, India’s foreign investment total is roughly what China’s was in the early-to-mid-1980s. After China launched its economic reforms in 1979, the authors point out, it took five to seven years of sustained economic growth before the outside world saw “that China was serious about reforming its domestic economy and opening to the rest of the world.” Much the same, they say, may prove true of India, which—after decades of socialism and of shunning foreign trade and investment—embarked in 1991, under then-prime minister P. V. Narasimha Rao, on a path of economic reform.

Liberalization has not gone as far as free-market enthusiasts would like, the authors say, but their modesty has made the reforms politically sustainable. “Major progress has been made in industrial deregulation, in
